In whatever language it takes we want to say to all our returning colleagues-in-scholarship, "Welcome back." To those who have battled the daily grind of summer jobs on minimum wage, may your wallets overflow. To those who have sweated out the summer in mission or ministry, may your learning find new inspiration. To those stalwart scholars who were shackled to their books and taking summer classes, may your GPA's ever ascend. And finally, to those who have spent the break lounging on a deserted beach somewhere in the Caribbean, may your suntans turn yellow!

Our family has grown a little while you were away. This past week we welcomed 90 new students in SOP, 110 new faces in SWM, and just under 300 new bodies in SOT. (Deborah Payne and her orientation team did a phenomenal job!) That makes around 1,600 students here on the Pasadena campus, not to mention the 800-plus at our extension sights.

We at the SEMI wish you a very good year. We trust that your Fuller experience for 94-95 is a life changing one. Blessings!

TECHNO-SEMI: THE WAY OF THE FUTURE?

by Laura Simmons, MA SOT

My mother will not touch a VCR. She is convinced she cannot learn how to use it, and that if she even touches it, it will surely explode. As technology quickly progresses, we may find ourselves responding to much of our world in that same way. We see cover stories about the dreaded "Information Highway" and fear that we may one day find ourselves forced to use it. We may fear we will travel it like the bus in the recent movie "Speed": very quickly, with no set destination, no way to slow down, and only amateur navigation skills.

How does this speed-of-light technological progress affect Fuller? Our seminary is slowly incorporating more and more technology into the educational process. Some of it (like our new state-of-the-art AT&T phone system) will impact us directly. Other innovations have a less direct, but still significant, effect on the seminary. On the local level, in some courses students are given the option of receiving handouts on computer disk. One clever theology professor recently allowed his students to borrow a disk containing course information and a mysterious file entitled "answers to the test." If students opened this file, they would see things like, "Study hard! Do the reading! Take good notes!" Some Fuller lectures are encountered, not in the classroom, but in the video-viewing room in the library; MB561 is one example of this use of technology. Students in this class, Introduction to Research Design, view lectures on video in their own time.

MEET THE PRESS:

The New SEMI Staff

SIMON HOLT - EDITOR

Pinching myself just doesn't help! Almost daily I feel an overwhelming sense of privilege to be a student at Fuller Seminary. I would never have imagined it.

Growing up in a government housing development in an industrial center south of Melbourne, Australia, simply pursuing a seminary education was privilege enough. Now having the opportunity to pursue advanced studies in Practical Theology is a most unexpected and appreciated gift from God.

After 10 years of ministry with the Baptist Church in Australia, my wife and I have come to Fuller with a thirst for refreshment and a vision for spiritual awakening in the daily lives of ordinary working-class Australians.

I come to this position of Editor with a deep appreciation for what this seminary community has given us in our first year. If I am able to have a small part in facilitating the strengthening of this community through my task as editor, then my experience here will be all the richer.

CARMEN VALDES - PRODUCTION EDITOR

It's been 3 years since I packed my belongings into a U-Haul and moved 3,000 miles west to the place I now call home: Pasadena. Until August of 1991, I had never been any further west than Chicago. Prior to graduating from college, I knew that I would continue my education in theological studies, but had no idea where that would lead. Three years after graduation, I found myself on the Fuller campus knowing no one but aware that this is where God had called me to be.

I'm at Fuller because I feel that I have been called into ministry as part of a staff team, and am especially interested in the Christian Formation and Discipleship of those who are part to the body of Christ. I have a desire to facilitate, not only in the planting of seeds but in the watering and harvesting of the same. I despise what I call the "pew potato" syndrome in which many, though they attend church regularly, sit in the back row, know no one and do nothing about their faith.

Though at first I came to the SEMI for somewhat selfish reasons, growing as a graphic artist/designer, I would not have taken the position had I not felt that this is where God wanted me to be. I have always enjoyed reading the SEMI and finding out what's happening on campus. I find that God has blessed me with some very wonderful people to work with and be encouraged by.

RICHARD SHAW - MANAGING EDITOR

I feel privileged to be working with my second SEMI team. If you were around for the summer editions of the SEMI, you already know just how talented this team is. For those of you who were too busy doing beach ministry, going to school or pondering the baseball strike, you will soon discover this truth.

It is our hope that even more than before, this paper will become your paper. For this to happen, we need you to do several things: first, read it, second, write in it, and third, tell someone about it. Here's to an exciting new year at the SEMI. Fuller Seminary, you are the "U" in SEMI. OK, so there's no "U" in Semi, what do you expect, I'm only the Managing Editor. ♦

AUSSIE ALUM'S APPRECIATION

During the summer I returned to Australia and had opportunity to visit three Fuller alumni - a Baptist pastor in Adelaide, a Dean of Students in a Melbourne Episcopalian seminary, and in Sydney, a School of World Mission graduate who is coordinating a multid denominational mission center. All were enthusiastic about their experience at Fuller. In fact, they indicated that their years at the seminary were some of the richest years of their lives.

Why do these graduates have such a positive response to their Fuller education? Perhaps one major reason lies with their involvement in our community. Each of them, with their families, connected themselves to various aspects of community life while they studied here.

My encouragement to all new and returning students is to make space and time in your schedules to be connected to our community. If you are able, become a part of a small group from the

ASC desk

through the Office of Christian Community; come along and join the fun of square dancing this fall, or the Harvest Festival organized by Housing Services; and let's not neglect the privilege we have of community worship on Wednesdays and Thursdays.

May your experience at Fuller this year be one that echoes my three friends in Australia. Come and contribute to our Fuller community.

Warm regards in Christ,

Rob Gallagher

TECHNO-SEM

When the class meets, the session is more like a lab session, using case studies to improve students' work.

Much of Fuller's other technological exploration occurs in the distance-learning arena. Many people want to study at Fuller or with Fuller professors, but are unable to relocate to Pasadena. Fuller has developed a number of innovative ways to "take the mountain to Mohammed," as it were. For example, last year during the Lenten season, several Fuller professors participated in a teleconference presentation for a church in San Antonio, Texas. This non-formal educational event was made possible by interactive television transmitted over telephone lines. Courses were taught here on campus and both teacher and students could see as well as interact with one another. This kind of teleconference will happen again this year for churches in San Antonio and in Albuquerque, New Mexico.

In addition to teleconferencing, Fuller is also experimenting with satellite-based conferencing. The School of World Mission is teaching Introduction to Missiology "live" this term, broadcast nationwide by satellite. While the instructor cannot see the viewers, people can call in during the broadcast, and their questions are put on a teleprompter for the instructor to see and answer.

Students doing courses by extension through the In-Service Program in the past received a packet of handouts, course materials and videotapes of lectures. Now they can receive all of that information via computer! The videos have been transcribed and the text is downloaded onto a student's computer. Students can interact with a small group or communicate individually with faculty via an electronic bulletin board.

I asked SWM Associate Dean Eddie Elliston about some of the ethical questions surrounding our use of technology. Will it make education impersonal? Does it fragment our community? He asked in turn, if someone is forced to relocate across the country for the bulk of their seminary education, are we doing them a service by removing them from their own community and accountability systems?

Dr. Russ Spittler (SOT) chairs the Technology Task Force, comprised of both staff and faculty, which exists, in his words, "to reach for ways in which technological advances all around us can be domesticated and put to use in our Seminary community." ♦
